Articles After we learn that vegetarian meat substitutes can be crafted from grains and beans, vegans and those who consider themselves vegetarian should also consider the impact of processing and milling operations upon grains and beans. Why Grain Products Matter for Vegans After we learn that vegetarians can create meat substitutes out of grains and beans, vegans and those who consider themselves vegetarian should also consider the impact of processing and milling operations upon grains and beans. As a vegan, I am aware that the foods I eat play an important role in shaping my body and the lives of others. This is true for my diet and the diet of those who consider themselves vegan. As I serve vegan food, I am aware of the impact I have on the lives of others. I may not interact directly, but by knowing their struggles, I impact their ability to get through each day and whatever difficulties they may face. After I learned how to craft the ingredients for a meat substitute, I decided to know what steps were taken to create the meat substitute. That meant learning about the process of processing and milling grains and beans. Unlike other animal proteins, whole grains are processed with all their constituents intact. Therefore, when we buy wheat and maize flour, we get the whole grain with its bran and germ components. When we buy white flour, we only get the endosperm, which is the part of the grain that can be processed into a substance that looks and tastes like flour. In addition to that, whole grain flours are substantially more nutritious than refined flours. The processing of grains affects the entire life of a grain. This begins with the harvesting of the grains. Farmers harvest the grains when they are at the optimum stage of ripeness. A ripe grain is in full development but has not fully matured. The grain has already stored the nutrient components that it will need for the next generation. The rest of the development of the grain consists of converting the nutrients to something that can be used. We can think of the whole grain as the raw material for the development and maturation of the grain. The harvesting of the grain takes place at the right moment to maximize the nutrient content of the grain, but it also limits the methods that can be applied to the grain. After the harvesting, the grains need to be processed to limit the damage that can be done to the grain. The processing of grains is done using different types of tools and equipment. Grains can be ground
