"I want to be able to walk outside that door and be able to call this, the greatest nation in the history of the world, my country," Romney said. It sounded like a sincere statement. But he must have known it was not, because just a few minutes later, while discussing foreign policy, Romney said that, given the name of the nation, "I can't pledge to keep it." The fact is, no one in the country wants to lose the election. But there is a real concern among many that, even if the economy improves, it will be difficult for Obama to get re-elected. The unemployment rate dropped to 7.8 percent in October, the lowest rate since 2008. Yet Americans are still waiting for the economy to come roaring back. The reason is that, despite the continuing unemployment numbers, job losses continue and continue to grow in size. After the debate, we thought the country might return to a more sensible place. But soon it was revealed that the president was not ready to give up the surge of illegal-immigrant drivers who have been caught by federal agents. He still wants to convince Americans that a welfare system is one of the reasons why they are out of work. His audience are people in the middle class who have lost their jobs and would like to look upon a president who is helping them find employment again. He wants their votes. If this were just a game and if there was nothing at stake, the presidential debate would be one of the few occasions that the national media devote a great deal of attention to a candidate. Because there are issues at stake — the great suffering of the country — there is little interest in anything except the candidates' chances of making or losing a powerful place in history.
