about religious ideology and beliefs (i.e., what one believes and why one believes it) in advanced high school philosophy classes is typically one of the key ways that many people in the world come to know about the Christian faith. According to Christianity Today, "the best and most comprehensive survey to date" of the views of students in philosophy classes nationally in the U.S. concludes that "there is a real danger that training in Christian apologetics undermines one's faith." Philosophy programs, particularly at elite institutions, are experiencing a massive drop in enrollment since 2008. (Recent stories about universities promoting a "diversity of thought" and "free thought" initiatives, however, seem more to indicate a recognition that free thought is incompatible with the belief that God created the universe and everything in it.) You have to wait until the end of the article for the surprise that is truly revealed: "Four in 10 students said their religion was Christian; this is a significant decline from 35% in 2008. In philosophy courses in particular, more than 60% of students attending elite institutions don't believe in God, compared with 35% in 2008. This is a big change. This is not the inevitable result of courses introducing students to a range of philosophies—as has been suggested by professors who lamented the decline in the faculty who teach in traditional philosophy departments." "It is possible that at elite institutions, Christian theology is being taught as a substitute for philosophical argumentation. Elitism and Christian nationalism have become the yardsticks for academic philosophy." "The decline in belief in God is happening everywhere, but at elite institutions where Christian theology and philosophy are taught as a substitute for philosophy, the shift is especially pronounced
