Q: How to differentiate between the client's and server's computations of a hash? I understand that a hash of some key is used by a server to verify the integrity of the transmitted data. I also understand that a hash is used by a client to compute the hash of some data to verify the integrity of the received data. But how can a client send the same data to the server and compute its hash at the same time? Doesn't it mean that the server will compute the hash for the same data twice? A: A client first computes the hash of the data, and then sends that hash along with the data to the server. The server checks the received hash, and if it matches, it trusts the data. Of course, this assumes that both client and server are running similar software and have access to the same library. It's also important to remember that the server is the one that does the verification, not the client. A: One could think of the same situation as two merchants at one counter (e.g. counter at McDonalds) paying their bill at the same time at the end of the day. Both have and use the same smartphone which uses the same software to verify the counter-checksums. I would have expected, that they have to split up the works on the day. But when they both arrive at the counter at exactly the same time (remember there are no time checks on the internet, so they are together at the exact same moment, they are both there), they would want to pay together (but not at the same time) and then they will all be sorted out. If it is unclear to you, how this can be, that both merchants arrive at the same time, then I will explain this with an example: Imagine two merchants and a counter. Merchant 1 can
