Overloud.BREVERB.v1.59-DYNAMICS.Currently, vinyl flooring is most commonly made by extrusion methods. In typical extrusion methods, vinyl and certain additives are combined in a mixing tank and extruded through a die. The extruded material is then cooled and wound up by a roll nip. The physical properties of the vinyl material vary depending upon the type of extrusion used. For example, extra-wide extruded vinyl is commonly produced by an "in-line" extrusion process, which produces extra wide vinyl sheet by advancing the material through an extruder and then onto a cooling drum, where it is cooled and wound up. In contrast, "off-line" extruded vinyl is commonly produced by advancing the material through a mixer to generate entanglements of small filaments, and then extruding the material through a die and onto a cooling drum, where it is cooled and wound up. With extrusion methods, the vinyl may include a plurality of different additives, such as pigments, resins, dyes, and the like, which are added to impart specific chemical and/or mechanical properties to the vinyl material. With extrusion methods, additives are generally added to the material mix in an upstream side of the extrusion apparatus, where they can be mixed into the vinyl material as the material is in the process of being made. In order to maintain adequate mixing of
