Administration of an 8% fat diet to rats induces bile-acid synthesis and results in a marked induction of hepatic cytochrome P450 activities. In this study, the effects of an 8% fat diet were compared to those of a high fat diet (27%) in rats which are normally adapted to a low fat diet (6%). The present study shows that the level of hepatic cytochrome P450 1A1 mRNA was decreased in rats fed a high fat diet. However, because of a reduction in the cytochrome P450 IIB1 mRNA level, the synthesis of CYP2B1 is enhanced. The hepatic vitamin K-dependent carboxylase activity (gamma-glutamyl carboxylase), measured by the formation of carboxylated and CO2-fixated products was enhanced in rats fed the high fat diet. The conversion of 13-hydroxy-9(Z),11(Z) docosatrienoic acid (13-HODE) to 13-hydroxy-docosatrienoic acid (13-HDTA) was decreased in the hepatic microsomes of the high fat-fed rats compared with those of the normal control group. Changes in the hepatic microsomal 12-oxo-heptadecatrienoic acid metabolism were also observed in the high fat-fed rats. The increase in cytochrome P450-dependent aldehyde oxidase activity (EC 1.2.3.1) and the decrease in cytochrome P450 4A activity suggest a decrease in the level of carbon chain-shortened fatty acids derived from arachidonic acid or eicos
