Gaston Bachelard's 1938 The Poetics of Space provides a fascinating and profound theory of how people experience spaces. "Space is not the absence of non-things but their presence;" he writes, "it is not a blank, a void; it is a full and definite being which can be inhabited." His discussion of the fundamental duality between the object and the backdrop conjures up a tangible and dynamic experience of the world. With the backdrop, or ground, set to our presence in a place, we are provided with an obstacle to overcome to understand the space as a whole. "The landscape of the absent....is as concrete as the space itself." This notion of a background might seem like a
