The present invention relates to a technique for detecting a leakage current from an active region. An active matrix substrate having thin film transistors (TFTs) formed on an insulating substrate is widely used in a liquid crystal display device. A variety of methods have been developed to detect a leakage current from a TFT in order to ensure the reliability of a TFT. The Japanese Patent Laid-Open Publication No. Hei 7-14027 proposes a technique for detecting a leakage current in a TFT by comparing a gate signal with a drain signal. The Japanese Patent Laid-Open Publication No. Hei 9-169770 proposes a method for detecting a leakage current in a TFT by comparing the drain signal with a gate signal. In Japanese Patent Laid-Open Publication No. Hei 7-14027, a voltage source and a known resistor are added to each gate line. In Japanese Patent Laid-Open Publication No. Hei 9-169770, a drain current is measured. The Patent Laid-Open Publication No. Hei 7-14027 judges that a leakage current has occurred in the TFT when the difference between a gate signal and a drain signal exceeds a predetermined value. However, the detection of leakage current is not precise. On the other hand, in the Patent Laid-Open Publication No. Hei 9-169770, a leakage current cannot be detected in a high temperature condition. Migrating cells penetrate deep into the brain when lung infection is present. Inflammation of the brain can be caused by an invading microbe in the lungs or by an immune-mediated response to an antigen introduced into the brain parenchyma. Whereas most studies of central nervous system (CNS) inflammation due to a virus or bacteria have focused on lesions at the surface of the brain or on the ventricular system, few studies have examined inflammation of deeper brain structures. We developed a method for identifying brain inflammation by detecting neurons bearing
