So, here I am. Back from yet another roadtrip in the short two-day period between 12/08/2011 and 12/09/2011. As a result I have not been able to keep up with you guys like I'd like to have. Hopefully I'll be able to keep up during the next one and to be able to have some of the links to the articles that I've missed. The post for one is two days later than I'd put it. You know how that goes. We're back on the subject of the amount of change in the Solar System; I think we're starting to see some interesting things on this scale. As each ship encounters a new target the change continues. In this article each major planet gets a little more feathered in. Jupiter: The old Uranus and Neptune are gone and Pluto is out of the mix. This is a small step forward. The old system didn't make much sense. The old Juno I on cross orbit with Jupiter will be required to make its way around on circuitous orbits in order to provide a massive boost of power. I'm thinking that there will be several named vehicles providing various amounts of time, and each one will provide a different combination of upgrades. Mars: The old Mars is gone and Mars II is now the primary target of the fleet. It's a small breakthrough - greater efficiency and then less fuel is needed in order to get around. Venus: A few ships take off for the old Venus to "empty" that planet and then move on. Earth: Three ships go to the Moon. The first is to study the Moon. The second follows and comes to rest and the third moves on. They allow us a 360-degree view of the Moon. I've been told that this is not the permanent arrangement. That the first of the three is supposed to stay but there will be more changes. Saturn: I was told there is a propulsion that allows us to effortlessly move to targets other than the primary. That's new. The orbit of Icarus II will change to bring it more in line with Icarus I's orbit. Uranus: Okay, this will be a significant evolution in the fleet. Neptune is just "done" with (speaking metaphorically). Uranus is the target. There is
