When I write a function, I can use an anonymous function, define a function, or define it within the HTML page. I've also read about `Function.prototype.bind()` and `Function.prototype.call()`, but the `Function.prototype.bind()` can only work with an existing function, whereas in the other cases, JavaScript will still create a new function, if one is not defined. So how can I write a function that can be called either as a function, or as an anonymous function? A: There is no way to do this with a plain function, but you could define a function like this: `function toValue(obj) { if(typeof obj === "function") { return obj(); } else { return obj; } }` and make sure to call your `toValue` function if your code looks like this: `var x = toValue(foo);` A: Use `call()`, like so: `var fnc = function (arg1) { var arg2 = 4; this.addAnotherArg = function (a, b) { this.a = arg1; this.b = arg2; }; }; var obj = new fnc(); fnc.prototype.addAnotherArg = function (x,y){ this.a += x; this.b += y; }; obj.addAnotherArg(5,7); document.write(obj.a + "," + obj.b);` This has drawbacks: you'll be checking to see that all functions in prototypes are functions in the right format; if you use `var f = new foo(); f.isFunc();` you'll c6a93da74d
