We should be wary about this new-found optimism about the future of work, writes Sjeng Schalk, CEO of W.L.E.R.M, Singapore. The recognition that digitalisation and automation has created too few jobs for too many people, is slowly gaining credence across the globe. More and more people are speaking up in different countries, languages and languages and on different scales, with a lack of trust in governments and trade unions, and a strong belief in this new technology that has unlocked economic and social progress. Most governments, like the UK and the US, are exploring ways to put in place legal frameworks to ensure a just transition of jobs to AI. But, if we shift our thinking from the traditional approach of filling jobs that we do not want to those that we do not know how to do, the same global and national competition issues remain. In Australia, there is no doubt that the conditions of employment for many young people have become uncertain or exist in the shadow of automation and related processes. As a consequence, young people are not prepared for work, they are not ready to start their careers, and they cannot rely on the quality of the work that they will have in the future. Take the theme of learning through the curriculum, for example. The idea that everyone should have a good education to prepare them for a job in the knowledge economy is put aside, as now the school curriculum is shifting towards vocational aspects. This is the result of a paradigm shift away from the idea of educating kids to become 'good citizens' to 'good workers'. Another way of putting this is that education is not designed to help prepare young people for a 'good life' but to prepare them for a 'good job'. This is where we are today. 5ec8ef588b
