The biggest new features will be most obvious to experienced Illustrator users. The biggest addition to the toolbox is the new Shape Builder, which is essentially a vector based version of the classic tools you can find in the previous release. You can draw a shape, add different points or nodes and create compound paths. There are many new shape tools that can be used with the Shape Builder, such as when you draw the Corner Rounder tool (or the Rounded Rectangle tool). A new Shape Fill (or Stroke) is found in the new Fill & Stroke palette, although it and the previous Shape Fill palette are very similar. A new vector tool is the Rectangle Select tool – which has become a familiar tool to many short of being mandatory. This tool can be used for more complex shapes, but you still need to know your way around and set a pivot point as you would with any shape tool. The most exciting aspect of this release is found in the Three D new feature set. Unlike the previous release, the new Three D feature set is used to create 3D effects. This new release comes to us from the Mac Video folks and should be of interest to both photographers and illustration professionals. To take advantage of the Three D new feature set, go to Mayday in the Format menu and check off the checkbox to access the 3D options. There are also a number of PDF improvements. The basic tools such as Arrange or Flatten are available, along with new versions of the signature used in PDFs which can be applied to text. New features include the ability to set a CMYK colour profile and create a CMYK digital signature.

only two major uses for Photoshop when your work is completed: If you are just getting started with Photoshop (or any photo editing program), you should have a basic understanding of how this program works. It helps in the process of pre-patching design to ensure a seamless subscription transition from the preliminary design to final production materials. One of the best features of the Internet is that people have the ability to share knowledge, knowledge that they have researched and developed over time. I believe that one of the best way to learn something is by teaching others, and so from time to time I choose to take the time to share and teach with others on the Internet. I tend to frown upon anyone who teaches just what they know because, well, I'm pretty good at that myself. I prefer to teach what I know and I have learned. Likewise, I also do not like to see an author teaching just what he or she wrote about, so if you come across some content in my posts that you think I could stand to improve upon, either by stopping teaching it or by expanding it, let me know. I'm happy to make a post about it, change the post, and then just link it back to you.

The plan for the year ahead is to release a new version of Photoshop that is more focused on web usage and acceleration. The plan is to retire the previous version as soon as practically possible, as we want to save as much time as possible moving forward. By focusing our resources on this big update, we will also be able to spend more time thinking about new features that make work easier or more productive. This is also what sparked our interest in the new Web Graphics Workflow Toolkit from Microsoft — we are very excited and pleased to see Microsoft pushing native web-native APIs and better web performance — and this is the same approach we want to take with Photoshop moving forward. The new Photoshop will look towards the future and enable us to focus our full attention on our own native Web Graphics Workflow Toolkit, in which we have been working on and experimenting with for more than six months now. It is an exciting time for us to be in the process of designing and building a new Photoshop, and the new and upcoming versions of Substance along with HTML and CSS will be part of the Photoshop led future. Now that Photoshop for the web is on a path to be deprecated, we are also deprecating some of the legacy legacy features that weren't chosen as the priority for the future as the native GPU-based Photoshop tools have been gaining adoption. When it comes to websites and using photos and images, one of the biggest challenges is being able to help your customers deliver beautiful and coherent images across all devices. Photographic images differ significantly depending on the device they are seen on. The web has evolved and changed considerably over the years, and in the past decade, especially the gap between desktop and mobile has become significantly narrower.
