I will not mention the color management, duplicate layer, and selective eraser issues. The Photoshop user base is large and, even if they don't buy into Lightroom 5, what they may do is keep using Lightroom 4. In this case, if they feel Color Reproduction Profiles are a good solution, they will add that feature to Lightroom. In case they don't, they will either stick to their pre-5 Photoshop or use something like DaVinci Resolve to get the job done. I will also not mention the now-truncated feature to Disable Lens Correction functionality, which I, myself, have never needed. (I have tested it, of course, but eventually found a good worked-around that lets me disable it.) The "automatic wiggle" problem has been fixed. That is, when dealing with layer mask, anything "held" on a single point, or a single color, will wobble when you use the Move Tool. This is very subtle and is really easy to miss. If you edit out the wrong layer, or anything that shouldn't be selected, you may get an error or, worse, a blank output image. This problem has supposedly been fixed on rectification, too, but I haven't got a chance to test it right now. In fact, I haven't been able to test really anything out of the box in Lightroom 5. I do have my demo of Resolve 12 installed, but I haven't given it a chance to operate auto-configured to test working with Lr. Being the poor man that I am, I just don't have the time to switch between Lightroom, my main document software, and Resolve at the same time.
