The thymus is involved in the developing of the immune system by providing a microenvironment for lymphopoiesis, immunoregulation and tolerance, whilst the ability to achieve tolerance to self results from the selective deletion of immature thymocytes. Immaturity of thymocytes has been shown to be related to their inability to function in the thymus. In the thymus, a series of molecular and cellular events occurs before commitment to the thymocyte lineage takes place. These events include the expression of the T cell antigen receptor (TCR), major histocompatibility complex (MHC) class II, T cell coreceptors and adhesion molecules. Additionally, the thymic epithelium is characterized by the presence of hormone receptors such as glucocorticoids and thymic hormones. The earliest events involve the appearance of the lymphopoietic progenitor cells. An early event occurs at the CD4-CD8 - double negative (DN) cell stage in which the double negative cells migrate out of the cortex into the medulla. Several adhesion molecules and cytokines are involved in DN cell migration. New blood vessels are also important to provide the necessary metabolic and nutritional support required by the cells as they migrate. The DN thymocytes undergo apoptosis, the signalling being mediated through Fas ligand, a member of the TNF family and the related receptor CD95. This induction of apoptosis appears to be the critical step in the deletion of thymocytes. Other cellular events also occur at the DN stage, including the expression of TCR and the chemokine receptor 7. The expression of these molecules is critical for later events, such as the expression of T cell coreceptors and the induction of positive selection (i.e. survival and proliferative induction of immature T cells).
