Check the box to create a copy, and you'll create a duplicate of the selected area. The feature works in a similar way to the Duplicate Command (Windows) or Command + Backspace (Mac) commands. To remove it, just check the option again. Using this command and the actual File command, you can make, say, 100 duplicates of a single image, or create a set of several numbered images. ABOVE: By highlighting to create a selection of a file, a pop-up will tell you the file's name. Add an underscore followed by a number, and that's the name you'll save in the project. The pop-up's style mimics the Save As dialog box. ABOVE: Adobe knows the ease of creating a PSD file can lead to massive files. When you download a massive file, the saved file automatically works just like a Windows exe. These files are a bit more difficult to open if you're not already familiar with the file format, which has more than 20 files, depending on the version. Unlike the PSDx file, the.specials tag can contain many elements.
