Content-aware fill and the GrabCut Algorithm are among the most important new features. After the release of Photoshop CS6 and Lightroom 5, it seemed that Adobe was really ready to take its professional photo editing to the more adventurous masses who also like to combine photos into collages. Then very few knew how to use Photoshop Lightroom and only a few could afford more powerful versions of the software. Now CS6 has been replaced with a new update, and things have changed somewhat. If you know how to use Lightroom effectively and feel comfortable with it, you can also use Photoshop. In fact, it is easier to use, provided that you have the skill. To make it easy for beginners, Adobe has retained the basic functions of the visual editor. In addition, it has removed some basic features, such as gradients and layers, as well as made basic editing faster. This release is a solid foundation and a good place to begin. Elements can be used completely as a standalone option to edit photos, but it is more cumbersome and has more features than the Premium version, which comes with Photoshop. Still, who believes in a standalone app when Photoshop makes you pay less for its stuff? Adobe is basically giving its customers a bit of a discount, to which the only actual argument is that using Lightroom may interfere with your minor Photoshop needs. Photoshop tends to be a more polished product, however. Many of its tools—from the Mosaic to Liquify tools—predict your moves as you alter your photo. A lot of the selection tools are different as well.

Unsharp mask also takes advantage of the Blur Motion Blur feature which can be found on most point and shoot cameras. Resize the layer as you wish. I suggested the original size was 1280x960 for the tag image. In order to adjust the Blur, I selected the Blur Ring (Black & White) tool. Select an aperture and adjust the blur option using the right arrow button at the bottom of the screen. If the background is slightly blurry due to the aperture, use the Left Arrow button to adjust. With the sharpness contrast set to 50, reduce the intensity using the star in the Fill section of the Layers panel. Next, change the solid black and white to a darker shade. I ended up with about 40. I move the layer blend into the Sharpened section of the Adjustments panel.
