As an Android device user, it is very important to know whether your device. More than three months have passed since two major cryptocurrency exchanges lost around $300 million in hot wallets - and they are just now putting in place the controls they need to prevent a repeat. But by then, the move already had considerable impact. When OKEx and Huobi announced in early July that they had been robbed of $300 million of cryptocurrency, exchanges were burned. They spent the next few days and weeks trying to recover as much of the stolen funds as possible. Once the institutions were convinced they had recovered more than 90 percent of the assets stolen, they took different paths. Huobi opted to get out of the cryptocurrency business, laying off all its staff except for its Singapore office. Huobi announced its withdrawal from the digital asset market last week. OKEx, meanwhile, continues to operate in the area, but also said it will cut 30 percent of its staff, from more than 100 to 75, and lay off another 40 percent by the end of the year. After the losses, companies whose hot wallets can accumulate and transfer coins and tokens spend a lot of time studying wallet security. At the same time, the companies see themselves as the “bank” for all the trading activity, making it a natural place for hackers to target. This is why exchanges are so widely targeted. A hacker can exploit one of the security vulnerabilities in an exchange’s hot wallets to gain access to a major chunk of cash. Hackers target the wallet
